How the Indian Prays.

"Prayer is the soul's sincere desir unuttered or expressed." And the manner of expressing desire may differ wide-The Indian may be as religious as is the Presbyterian, yet he never kneels when he prays. He never addresses the deity by word of mouth at all. Yet he asks for the blessings he needs, and asks for them with as much faith and as much reverence as does his whiter brother. They want a good corn crop and they gather a handful of green twigs or grasses, bind them together with a reverent faith that the deity is willing and able to help them; they lay the emblems or hang them in a place where the sun will shine upon them and leave, assured that their prayer has been heard.

It may not be answered. The corn may not prosper right away, but they are in no wise discouraged. They bind together another emblem and offer it in another place. Some places have particular favor. It is believed the deity sees them place them there better than in other places. It is simply the Christian's idea of sanctuary in another form -Chicago Herald.

Her hat is "peak off," into the regulation top for a crown. But she isn't wearing any such mark of power. She has simply put on her fall bonnet and is wearing it, not for the porpose of astonishing the natives, but simply because it is fashionable. If she is a very fashionable woman she has had a piece of her dress material let into the top of her burnished gold but, and at the very back of the whole affair she has caused a whole field of brace duisies to be fastened upright, so that they nod upon their wiry stems and wave to and fro as their wearer walks or talks, hows

Suddenly a number of elegantly shaped, slightly built animals appeared in the distance and rushed toward the moving train. The wind, the antelopesfor such they proved to be-and the train engaged in a race, in which the antelopes for a short time held their own; but what most astonished me was that the antelopes were pursued by great gray balls, some of which were from four to five feet in diameter. Not one of our party could imagine what these were, never having heard of anything of the kind. We watched the curious sight until the locomotive and the wind left the antelopes and the pur sning balls far behind us. To increase our interest, however, many more such balls could be seen on the windward side of the track, piled up against the wire fences and in ravines and gulleys along our onward route.

I afterward learned that what our party saw were known to the plainsmen as "tumble weeds," and to botanists as the Cycloloma plalyphylium. It belongs to a genus of plants that grow in a thick globe shaped mass of twigs and small branches, attached to their roots each by a small stem, which in the fall becomes dry and brittle, and, as the autumn winds sweep over the prairie, these stems break off and the tumble weeds go bounding away, scattering their seeds as they go

Language of Elephants. The language of the elephantis as well understood by the East Indians and those who have to do with the large animals as if the communication was made in their own tongue, though, curious to tell, the sounds in India and Ceylon have different meanings imputed to them When enraged the elephant utters a shrill cry through the trunk, which may be taken as a warning. A sportsman engaged in hunting elephants had approached a large tusker when he found, to his chagrin, that he had dropped his ammunition, so that he could only lie concessed and feast his eves upon the huge animal. His disappointment was partly compensated by observing the large elephant informing the rest that danger was lurking near them. Communication was made in the following way:

The tusker was feeding and moved slowly around until he suddenly came below the concealed sportsman, when, with its wonderful scent, it immediately recognized the presence of an enemy. It stopped feeding, raised the tip of its trunk cautiously, then in a low, suppressed, but penetrating tone uttered with its lips the word "prut," repeating it so that it sounded something like the twittering of a bird. The sound would hardly have been noticed had not the sportsman been near at hand; but it was immediately understood by the herd, that moved quickly but silently away, followed by the sentinel .- St. Paul Dis

Simplicity of Carlyle's Life.

Training for Modern Life. Every man ought to know what kind of a universe he is in, what his relations to it are, what and where invariable conditions are imposed, what in the nature of things is possible and what impossible, within what limits all his achievements must be, and hence what ideals he may consistently cherish that his work may not be in vain. It hardly needs to be said that neither literature nor art nor history nor theology can acquaint a man with these. Only science can do it-science not as a mass of facts, but as a body of relations. If there be anything that the ordinary man is markedly deficient in, and which the best schooling has not added to his mental equipment, it is his failure to see the necessities of relation. Exercises in logic and the study of mathematics have been supposed to qualify a man to be logical, but if by this is meant that for every effort to be explained an adequate cause must be assigned, then most men are unequal to the occasion.-Professor A. E. Dolbear in Popular Science Monthly.
